TO USE WAR FILM IN VICTORY LOAN DRIVE

The greatest motion picture film of the war, "The Price of Peace," filmed by the United States signal corps photographers, a pictorial record of the first American attack at Chateau Thierry, will feature the motion picture campaign of the Victory Liberty loan. The Treasury Department announces. The Chamber of Commerce has endorsed the plan.

This feature shows where the Liberty loan billions went and contains the hottest fighting scenes yet shown on the American screen. In addition to the Chateau Thierry scenes, a German plane being destroyed in the air and a field piece with its crew being wiped out by an exploding shell are shown.

One of the photographers working on this film was killed in battle while taking it. This film will not be shown in the theaters, but 100 prints have been made of it by the Treasury Department, and it will be shown throughout the United States without admission charge.

More than two million feet of film will be employed in putting the Victory loan across, and it will all be supplied to the Treasury Department by the motion picture industry at the actual cost of the film itself without profit to any individual or concern in the business.

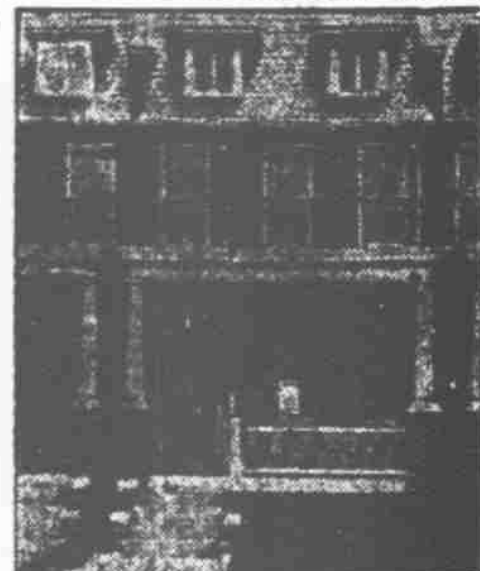

The exhibition of the films will be made by the theaters without charge to the Government and motion picture stars, producing companies and scenario writers have donated their services for the execution of the campaign.

New films by Douglas Fairbanks and Julian Eltinge have already been produced, and Liberty loan films made by thirty-seven stars for the last loan which were not shown in many sections of the country on account of the influenza epidemic have been altered and retitled for this campaign.

Another important motion picture feature consists of the dramatization of ten of the best deeds of heroism of American soldiers staged at Camp Dix, N. J., from official description of these deeds, using actual American soldiers as the actors under the direction of officers that have seen foreign service.
